Wines

The Neri offer in matters of wine is the wise summary of a past that has not been forgotten and of the climate “treasure” that the North side of Mt. Etna provide to a flourishing lineage of “volcanic wines”. The production and the Neri family know-how confirm that, in the shadows of the volcano the future has an ancient heart.
